Commentary - Quantica Capital AG - September 2022 ⁽¹⁰⁾

The Quantica Managed Futures (QMF) Program returned 5.28% in September 2022, bringing its year-to-date net performance to 16.27%.

September witnessed a continuation of strong trends across multiple asset classes, with several unprecedented moves in FIIR and FX markets. The QMF Program consistently maintained its net short exposure to bonds, short-term rates and equities, as well as short exposure to multiple currencies against the USD. All these positions contributed positively to performance last month. Net long exposure to commodities detracted.

With global yields rising rapidly across the curve, all FIIR markets recorded a profit, adding 4.1%, with exceptional contributions coming from Gilts as well as British SONIA and the Euribor markets. Short positions in the Japanese Yen, the Pound Sterling and the Euro added 2.3% to September's returns, with FX gaining 2.4% overall.

Equity markets also made a large positive contribution last month, adding 3.0%, with equity index futures such as MSCI Emerging Markets, Hang Seng, Euro Stoxx 50, FTSE 100, and Dow Jones being key contributors.

On the commodity side the picture was mixed, as the Program's net long exposure in multiple energy markets (such as Heating Oil, Natural Gas and European CO2 emissions) detracted and overall performance of the asset class was -2.8%.

Throughout September, the QMF Program increased its net notional short equity exposure from -15% to -44% and its net notional short bond 10-year duration equivalent exposure from -26% to -49%. At the same time, it reduced its net notional long US Dollar exposure from 62% to 35%. Finally, the Program's net notional long commodity exposure was also reduced, albeit marginally from 27% to 17%.

As we enter October, while short positions in the Japanese Yen, the Euro, and the Pound continue to represent the portfolio's top 3 risk exposures, two-thirds of the Program's overall risk is equally distributed between short FIIR and short equity positions.
